

Dear FCC,

I contacted you earlier regarding your desire to restrict the content of XM Radio. The longer I got to thinking about it, the more I realized what an act of cowardice it is on your part to try to limit this service to the public. If the public wants to pay for a service, who are you to decide what they should get for their money if the service wasn't your idea in the first place. This is completely insane. It is obvious that you are scared of XM making mainstream radio obsolete. HELLO! So long as citizens of the United States have a right to choose the services they wish to consume, there will always be the potential that another will become obsolete. Face it! This is how consumerism works. As I said before, if it is between paying a few extra dollars for my radio and getting more than what is already offered, I'll do it. I see no problem with that and I feel as though your agency is trying oppress my rights by working to limit my access to services that potentially better my life circumstances.

I appreciate your concern in the matter, but I beg that you reconsider your wishes to limit XM Radio's content because XM provides a great service to its audience with its instant traffic and weather...among other great stations!

Kindest regards,
Carrie Probst
